Google's Pixel 4 replaces complicated optics with AI

VLAD SAVOV
Tokyo, Oct 16

GOOGLE'S LATEST SMARTPHONE demonstrates how artificial intelligence and software can enhance a camera's capabilities, one of the most important selling points of any mobile device.

The Pixel 4, the latest entrant in a phone line defined by its cameras, touts an upgraded ability to zoom in when shooting photos as its biggest upgrade. But the Alphabet company isn't going about it the way that Samsung, Huawei or Apple have done — instead of adding multiple cameras with complicated optics, Google has opted for a single extra lens that relies on AI and processing to fill in the quality gap.

In place of the usual spec barrage, Google prefers to talk about a "software-defined camera," Isaac Reynolds, product manager on the company's Pixel team, said in an interview. The device should be judged by the end-product, he argued, which Google claims is a 3x digital zoom that matches the quality of optical zoom from multi-lens arrays. The Pixel 4 has two lenses with a magnification factor between them that's less than 2x, and the tech that extends that useful range is almost entirely software.

The success of the Pixel's camera is instrumental to Google's broader ambitions: it drives Google Photos adoption, provides more fodder for Google's image libraries, and helps create better experiences with augmented-reality applications — such as this year's new on-screen walking directions in Google Maps.

Super Res Zoom, a feature Google launched last year, uses the slight hand movements of a photographer when capturing a shot — usually a hurdle to creating crisp images — as an advantage in crafting an image that's sharper than it otherwise would be. The camera shoots a burst of quick takes, each one from a slightly different position because of the camera shake, then combines them into a single image. It's an algorithmic trick that lets Google collect more information from imaging hardware, and potentially also a moat against any rivals trying to copy Google — because others can't just buy the same imaging sensors and replicate the results.

To augment its reliance on AI and machine-learning tasks, Google has designed and added its own Pixel Neural Core chip for the Pixel 4 lineup. It accelerates the machine-learning speed of the device and, again, is intended to differentiate Google's offering from other Android smartphones on the market with a Qualcomm Snapdragon processor at its core.

The other major tool in Google's AI kit is called RAISR, or Rapid and Accurate Image Super Resolution, which trains ages. The system is taught to recognise particular patterns, edges and visual features, so that when it detects them in lower-quality shots, it knows how to improve them. That's key to creating zoom with "a lot smoother quality degradation," as Reynolds put it. With more than a billion Google Photos users, the US company has a massive supply of images to train its software on.

Among the other features that Google offers with the Pixel 4 is the ability to identify the faces of people that a user photographs most often and ensure that they're prioritised when capturing new snapshots — making sure the camera focuses on them and that their eyes aren't closed, for instance. That use of software technology has defined Google's devices to date and is also evident in the way Facebook, Amazon and Apple aim to employ their own AI systems.

'Defiant message' as N Korea's Kim rides white horse

North Korean leader Kim Jong Un rides a horse during snowfall in Mount Paektu on Wednesday

REUTERS
Seoul, October 16

AIDES TO KIM Jong Un are convinced the North Korean leader plans "a great operation", state media said on Wednesday in a report that included lavish descriptions and images of the leader riding a white horse up North Korea's most sacred mountain.

In the photos released by state news agency KCNA, Kim is seen riding alone on a large white horse through snowy fields and woods on Mt Paektu, the spiritual homeland of the Kim dynasty.

"His march on horseback in Mt Paektu is a great event of weighty importance in the history of the Korean revolution," KCNA said.

Having witnessed the great moments of his thinking atop Mt Paektu, all the officials accompanying him were convinced with overflowing emotion and joy that there will be a great operation to strike the world with wonder again and make a step forward in the Korean revolution."

It was unclear what the operation might involve, but Kim has often made trips to the sacred mountain at times of major policy endeavours

Analysts say the symbolism underscores North Korea standing up to international sanctions and pressure over its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programmes.

"This is a statement, symbolic of defiance," said Joshua

Pollack, a North Korea expert at the Middlebury Institute of International Studies in California. "The pursuit of sanctions relief is over. Nothing is made explicit here, but it starts to set new expectations about the coming course of policy for 2020."

In late 2017, Kim visited Mt Paektu days after North Korea launched its largest inter-continental ballistic missile, and weeks before he made a key New Year's speech in which he opened the door to engagement with South Korea.

Last year, Kim took South Korean President Moon Jae-in to the top of the mountain as part of a historic summit.

Since then relations have cooled and Kim has said he will only wait until the end of the year for the United States to soften its stance in denuclearisation negotiations before North Korea will pursue an unspecified new path forward.

Several experts said much of the rhetoric in the KCNA report revolves around the economy, and they suspect North Korea may soon conduct a space launch. That would enable the North to show off its economic and technological power in a less provocative way than by testing an ICBM.

The language in Wednesday's state media report suggests Kim may be "contemplating some major policy decisions," said Rachel Minyoung Lee, an analyst with NK News, a website that monitors North Korea.
